Dear Team,

I am a graphic design student at the University of Massachusetts Lowell with experience in graphic design, web design, and photography. I am interested in joining your team and contributing my creative and technical skills. My multidisciplinary background allows me to approach design from different perspectives, combining visual storytelling, conceptual thinking, and technical execution.

My work focuses on creating compelling visuals that communicate ideas and evoke emotion. Through projects involving brand identity, editorial design, and photography, I have developed an interest in how typography, imagery, and identity work together to tell a story. For example, I developed a hearing protection brand identity that sells more than a product but an awareness regarding hearing damage, through a combination of striking portraiture and branding that bring the serious consequences of noise exposure to the forefront of the design. I have also developed a book focusing on brand identity, where I explored the psychology behind it and how it translates to design choices. Projects like this have strengthened my ability to translate abstract concepts into recognizable visual identities.

Cohesive branding is another strength I would bring to your team. My experience includes logo design, typography, layout, and color theory, which I use to develop distinctive visual identities. My creative process involves exploring how these elements work together to communicate a brand's personality and message. With experience in both graphic and web design, I understand how to maintain a consistent visual identity across digital and print formats. I designed and developed a responsive website for my photography business, integrating original branding with an interactive portfolio. I have also made physical, multi-page prints, combining design with my photography. These experiences have strengthened my understanding of how design translates across digital and print formats.

I will bring a strong interest in visual storytelling, cohesive branding, and creative problem-solving to your team. I enjoy exploring unconventional ideas while ensuring that my design decisions support a clear message. I am eager to collaborate with experienced designers, expand my skills, and contribute to projects that challenge me creatively.

Thank you for considering my application. I would welcome the opportunity to discuss my portfolio and how my experience could contribute to your team.
